It aims to present the latest issues and opportunities in digitisation, digitalisation, technological developments and artificial intelligence in the cultural sector. The conference will also address related policies, trends and strategies, and present good practices in the areas of digitisation, new competences and skills, technological challenges and the use of AI.

The two-day event (14 and 15 October) will take place in three different venues, each of which will be adapted to the specific challenges of the cultural heritage areas: the Hungarian National Museum, the National Széchényi Library and the Petőfi Literary Museum.
